About the Research

Learning and Work Institute is an independent research organisation committed to improving education and work in the UK. As part of our work on the European Agenda for Adult Learning, we are launching an evidence review to map current provision of in-work progression initiatives across Northern Ireland in order to establish areas of best practice and gaps in existing support. This will culminate in an evidence-based report with recommendations for policy and practice to aid future commissioning and delivery.

To do this, we are reaching out to relevant people and organisations and asking them to identify relevant programmes. We are interested in hearing about all initiatives, as long as they are based in Northern Ireland and their primary aim is to support low-paid workers to improve their pay, better their employment contract or progress in work.

Relevant initiatives may follow a variety of support pathways, including:

- Individual-focussed support aimed at helping low-paid workers to improve their employment situation through the provision of advice and additional support.
- Training and skills-related support to help workers to upskill and progress within their current or new roles.
- Working with employers to support them to improve skills, pay or progression opportunities of low-paid employees within their organisation.

You can register the details of a maximum of 10 initiatives - if you would like to register more, please begin a new survey.

Once the initial scoping exercise to identify relevant initiatives is complete, we will conduct a more detailed review to gather further information.
